

I am terribly distressed at Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to air "Stolen Honor," an anti-Kerry documentary, just days before this Presidential election. Not only is this a perfect example of the extreme dangers of media consolidation, but it's also a horrible abuse of the public airwaves that are meant to serve the public, and not assault them with biased political propaganda.

Sinclair Broadcasting has an obligation to serve the greater public interest over its own political agenda. The public does not deserve to see politically motivated documentaries for either side of this campaign on public airwaves. What the public deserves is real news given to them from objective perspectives about the issue that really matter.

I pray that the FCC will identify the dangers of Sinclair's actions and move further towards a tightening of media regulation and not a loosening of the rules. Sinclair's decision is not only un-American, it's undemocratic and a detriment to our society.
